Protecting the South's Environment
through the POWER OF THE LAW

Introducing InThePath.org, stories on the human costs of the Atlantic Coast Pipeline

Few environmental issues in recent memory have generated more public concern than the proposed Atlantic Coast Pipeline, the $5-6 billion, 600-mile Dominion Energy and Duke Energy project intended to move natural gas from the fracking fields of West Virginia to the Atlantic shores of Virginia and North Carolina.

While challenging the unnecessary, environmentally destructive project on multiple fronts, SELC has also been documenting the profound human costs of building the Atlantic Coast Pipeline. With a team of filmmakers, we've been talking with the people who live in the pipeline's path, and today, with the launch of InThePath.org, we present their stories.

“This is not in service of any citizen or homeowner along its path. This is just a land grab for a privately owned utility.”

—C'ta DeLaurier, in the pipeline's path in Shipman, Virginia

Each story has a pivotal moment of recognition that may well be familiar to you. For the Harrises, it was when Dominion told them they would be bulldozing just behind their kids' swing set, despite the parents' objections. For Hazel Palmer, it was when she realized the pipeline developers could sue her for not letting them survey her property, but she couldn't sue them for taking land she wasn't interested in giving up.

Please visit InThePath.org to learn more about the Harrises, the Palmers, and other local families fighting to protect their land and livelihoods from the ACP. And visit the SELC News Feed to catch up on what SELC is doing to stop this threat to the land and people of Virginia and North Carolina.
